Divers Raise a Mystery Cauldron From an English River

The heavy iron pot sat on the riverbed for hundreds of years, and nobody knows why it was there

Imagine finding a giant pot at the bottom of a river! Underwater archaeologist Gary Bankhead spotted an iron cauldron in the River Wear, near Sunderland in northern England, while diving in September 2025. This month, his team finally lifted it out, about two months before Halloween.

It was not easy. The cauldron weighs nearly 70 pounds, too heavy for one diver. Divers freed it from the debris, wrapped it in green netting inside a metal cage, and a crew raised it onto a boat after months of planning.

Experts think it is medieval, but it might even be from the Iron Age. Now it is being cleaned at a conservation lab in York. Scientists plan to X-ray it, look for leftover food and maybe use radiocarbon dating to find its age. Why was it in the river? Maybe as part of a ritual or an offering.

Tech Corner: Computers That Listen to the Wild

Scientists use sound recorders and AI to protect animals without bothering them. Recorders hide in trees or sit on the ocean floor for months. In Tanzania, a computer learned to tell individual lions apart by their roars with over 95 percent accuracy. In Vietnam, recorders help find the cao-vit gibbon: only 74 are left.

Halloween Fun Around Metro Detroit This Weekend

Not-too-spooky fun is planned for Oct. 29–31. The Detroit Zoo's Zoo Boo runs Friday and Saturday, and Brick or Treat is Saturday at The Robot Garage in Birmingham. Downtown Berkley and Farmington host trick-or-treat strolls on Saturday, and Halloween in the D is free across Detroit. Check each event's page for details.
