Fingerprints Hint That Women and Kids Helped Build China's Clay Army

Tiny marks left in 2,000-year-old clay may reveal who really made the warriors

More than 2,000 years ago, an emperor of China was buried with an army of about 8,000 life-size clay soldiers. Farmers digging a well found the Terra-Cotta Army in 1974. Now, thanks to fingerprints, scientists have a new idea about who made it.

A team led by archaeologist Xiaoxi Li studied 79 well-preserved fingerprints pressed into 36 of the warriors. Using a statistics method, they estimated that about 45 percent of the prints came from adult women, about 33 percent from adult men and about 22 percent from young people under 15.

The team says it is the first biological evidence of a varied workforce, though the sample is small. Still, each print is a hello from someone who lived two thousand years ago.
