Divers Find What May Be the World's Oldest Shipwreck

A 4,700-year-old boat off the coast of Turkey still holds its cargo of big clay jars

Archaeologists say they may have found the oldest shipwreck ever discovered. It lies off the coast of Turkey, near Kekova Island, and experts think it sank about 4,700 years ago, long before the pyramids of Giza were finished being built.

The ship was probably carrying big clay jars of olive oil or wine, and some still hold bits of what was inside. One archaeologist could not believe how much was left. Scientists will study the jars to learn what people ate and where they traded.
