Perseverance Sets a Distance Record on Mars

The six-wheeled robot has now driven farther than any rover on another world

NASA's Perseverance rover just passed a big milestone. On October 11 its odometer rolled past 45.22 kilometers, about 28.1 miles. That beats the 45.16 kilometers driven by the Opportunity rover, which held the off-world driving record for years.

Opportunity explored Mars from 2004 to 2018, nearly fifteen years. Perseverance landed in 2021, so it covered the same kind of distance in about five and a half years. One reason is a self-driving system called AutoNav. As the rover rolls, it looks at the ground, builds a 3D map of rocks and holes, and picks a safe path to its next waypoint.

Right now Perseverance is heading toward a spot called Idubi, just off the western rim of Jezero Crater. Scientists hope to find clues about hot water that flowed there long ago. The rover's mission was just extended through about the end of 2028, so its record should keep growing.

A Crater With Spider Legs

A satellite photo shows Spider Crater in Western Australia, and it really looks like a spider. The oval crater is about 13 by 11 kilometers wide. A meteorite hit long ago, and the ground bounced up in the middle. Over hundreds of millions of years, wind and water wore away softer rock, but hard pale sandstone ridges stayed behind and now stretch out like legs. Scientists were sure it was an impact because of special shatter cones in the rock.
